- Students will apply and evaluate multiple models of language. Students will respond critically to linguistic scholarship and utilize appropriate sources in constructing critical arguments about language.
- Students will write discipline-appropriate reviews and research, using appropriate sources and documentation standards. In both individual and collaborative assignments, student will produce course-appropriate projects and papers. Students will present work orally in a discipline-appropriate format.
- Students will analyze data from a diverse variety of languages. Students will identify and analyze examples of the relationship between language, power and society.

- Students will produce linguistic analyses informed by independent research. Students will locate and evaluate appropriate sources and/or gather linguistic data, for the study of given linguistic phenomena. In writing, students will demonstrate their ability to propose an analysis and/or to reflect on the proposal made. Students will document sources and collect data ethically and appropriately.
- Engage in critical self-reflection and reflection of the material covered in each course to demonstrate an understanding their agency and social responsibility as members of a local and global community, their life-long learning experience and how their knowledge of linguistics can have an impact in society.
